

Maryland Co-eds Greet Revived Fall Fashions

Diamondback Photos—George Sing

Fashion editors are looking toward the future through glasses tinted with shades of the 1920's. The silhouette, with its sloping shoulders, wrapped slim skirt and small close hat, is modified after the impressions and reflections of nearly thirty years ago.

Desire Extreme Fashions

Designing women are working toward the return of the chemise dress, the raccoon coat, the slicker rain coat, the ankle bracelet, multiple chains of beads, etc. Anything they have forgotten, your imagination may safely supply.

Important in high fashion this year are the scissors skirt, long and impossibly tight, the winged collar, featuring a neckline that juts off at a terrifying angle, the bat collared suit, which looks more like a cartwheel than a costume. One can happily assume that these creations will never take hold on the campus.

Co-ed Less Drastic

Safer predictions are that the campus co-eds will take to tweed suits, especially those trimmed in velvet, to little dark dresses with bright flowers pushed boldly up against the collar, to loosely pleated skirts scooped in at the waist with great leather belts.

The college girl will probably spend the winter months in the new inexpensive fur coat which unashamedly masquerades as a fine fur. Her school and street coat could be full or fitted as fancy or figure demand. Evening dresses are long or short, but always dramatic.

Accessory Department

The scoop of the accessory department is the tight little hat with feathers or ribbons scouting off at angles. Handbags are small and shaped like efficient little satchels. Gloves are eye-catching and different this year; many are shown in velvet, taffeta and frothy net.
