

THE STORK CLUB

Helen Morgan and a small-time Broadway gambler are the babies to whom the Stork owes its present existence. When Billingsley—after an exciting career in the real estate business whose only moments is a street named after him—opened his first club, the new proprietress sapped his dwelling resources. A few days before he was scheduled to close, Helen Morgan took over the entire room for one evening to celebrate the production of her first movie. The check for that party amounted to $4,000—a boon to the fast-living cafe. And that's why Helen Morgan never will receive a check at the Stork Club, forevermore.

Some months later, when Billingsley again was about to retire from the show field for lack of audience, a Broadway gambler delivered $2,000 into his hand, accompanied by the words, "I'm going out of town for a while," he explained, "and I want you to hold this money for me."

Billingsley used that money to satisfy the wolf-creditors who had taken their station at his door. The gamblers later returned to Broadway and received his $2,000.

The Stork Club, first established downstairs on E. 38th St., and then upstairs on E. 51st St., was a safe bet because it was run by Federal Government agents during the Prohibition era. The violation had been a flagrant one, for Billingsley's speakeasy, unlike any other then operating in the city, featured a canopy over the entrance and carpeting over the floor. With the advent of Repeal, Sherman closed his quarters and moved the Stork Club to its present site at 3 E. 53rd. And here, when the stock market has attained new highs, Billingsley has netted as much as $23,000 a month.

THE BIGGEST SPENDER at the Stork Club is Billingsley himself (right). He gives away each week as much as the average New York night club grosses. Three years ago Billingsley's accountants reported an alarming "leakage" in the liquor supply. Sherman studied the mystifying report, and decided that someone must be stealing. He therefore retained investigators. After a four-week check-up they submitted their report. Yes, they had found the culprit responsible for this "leakage." He had each night ordered free drinks supplied to the patrons and expensive wines sent to their houses—and then held walk-out without paying. The culprit was Mr. Sherman Billingsley.

ERNEST HEMINGWAY, celebrated writer of war stories, finds "peace" at the Stork Club.

HELEN MORGAN, piano-singing singer, spent $4000 at Billingsley's when he needed it most.

"If you were at the Stock," Ernest Hemingway once wrote in an introduction to "All the Brave," "you would not have to pay. You would just watch The People, and listen."

To watch them would be to see Bea Little, hunting under the table for a small emblem Grace Moore had pinned upon her, somewhat carelessly. Bea discovered, too late, that this was the decoration presented to the opera singer by the Queen of France when she became Chevalier of the Legion d'Honneur.

Dr. Roy Allen Dafos, escorting Ethel Merman, sat himself at a table occupied by three Broadway columnists—after signing a contract to write articles about babies—and told the newspapermen, "I'm sitting in. Now I'm one of you."

The stars of Broadway and Hollywood, the foremost industrialists of our time, members of the President's Cabinet—all come to the Stork Club.

I've seen all the fights in the Stork Club and not one of them merited the publicity it attracted. The George White-Sidney Solomon "basticuff" had an auspicious audience. When White merely slapped Solomon's face—an event which, like the others, would have been forgotten had it taken place somewhere else—Tallulah Bankhead and her Aunt Marie were side observers. "Now I have lived!" Aunt Marie sighed, after the fight. "I've been to New York, I've seen the World's Fair. I've been to the Stork Club, and I've seen a fight there. Now I'm going back to Alabama and can truthfully say, 'Friends, I've seen EVERYTHING.'

TALLULAH BANKHEAD's father is Speaker of the House, she is Speaker of the Stork.
