Historic Incidents in the Life of St. Frederick Wilhelm

(As revealed by his utterances)

At an early age he struggled hard to keep his father from declaring an unrighteous war.

Unlike his compatriots, things military were abhorrent to him. He preferred the pleasures of peace.

This good Prince dearly loved his soldiers, and lived with them in the trenches.

And his soldiers, too, loved their brave, simple, honest leader.

He knew no hate; for he admired above all men the leader of his enemies, Mr. Wilson.

With tears he pleaded that his country should desist from submarine outrages, which wrung his heart.

He begged that his generals should declare peace, for which his whole soul yearned.

At last the Powers of wickedness triumphed in his realm, and this good man left for other climes.

But in his exile the saint is happy, because he knows he has led a blameless life.
